"Eighteen," Tuck echoed under her breath. The District Attorney bent forward suddenly and looked at Bunny. "It's a cool stab," he told her, "strange how cool it gets on a young..."

Michael looked down at the pebbles incredulously. "They lay all together in a little heap on the table." He picked one up and studied it. "Dammit!" he said reverently.

"Those pencil marks. Maybe it's one word in big this letter. Turn up." All the marks I found were on the smooth paper. It means something.

John Forrester had hit his chest again, and stood at the desk. He looked down at the (mela bits of bond paper, pushed into a heap by Michael's long fingers. "It's a picture puzzle," he said slowly.

"It seemed as if they were getting nowhere. But Tuck started them on the right track when she pushed to the top of the stack the de-linguist and more oblong than the others.

Michael touched a pebble slowly. "If this one is the first one, right at the top of the stack," he decided. He shook it with his fingers; it was firm, although some of the whitest came off in his hand. He took out his penknife and thrust it underneath, and the pebble came out of its setting easily. Michael cut it with his knife.

SIPPING AWAY FROM THE DILINO APE-HAL, MARINA HAD JANE THROWN INTO THE SHIP'S STROKAOOH, AS SHE LOCKED THE STEEL DOOR.

"I think they kept the pebbles in each the days by," Tuck said moodily. "One for each day of the month. If they sent each other five pebbles it meant they would meet on the fifth."

"Then she won't interfere again!" snapped the savage-hearied princess.
